Introduction to Biostatistical Methods
BIST6104P

1 section

Like many fields of learning, biostatistics has its own vocabulary often seen in medical and public health literature. Phrases like statistical significance", "p-value less than 0.05", "95% confident", and "margin of error" can have enormous impact in a world that relies on statistics to make decisions: Should Drug A be recommended over Drug B? Should a national policy on X be implemented? Does Vitamin C truly prevent colds? However, do we really know what these terms and phrases mean? Understanding the theory and methodology behind study design, estimation and hypothesis testing is crucial to ensuring that findings and practices in public health and biomedicine are supported by reliable evidence.

COURSE REGISTRATION – HOW TO

Registration – Wait List

Some departments closely monitor their course enrollment and choose to enroll students via the waitlist only. Students may find themselves on a course's waitlist even though there are seats available. Departments monitoring course enrollment will slowly admit students into the course at their discretion.

Wait lists come in two forms:

1. Auto-fill Wait List: Allows students to enroll into a course as seats become available, and students can see their position number on Auto-fill Wait Lists.
2. Self-managed Wait List: Students must first join a Wait List. Approval is based on the student's priority status (second year, first year, department, certificate, etc).
