Throughout the years, I have developed a strong appreciation for innovation as the most vital tool to address the challenges we face in health, reduce inequalities, and maximize. Transforming the health care sector requires three main elements: ensuring that the most underserved communities have access to quality health care, engaging in prevention efforts to enable the well-being of individuals, families, and communities, and strengthening public health strategies to drive better health outcomes. Therefore, I am thrilled to support the Columbia Mailman School of Public Health's mission of designing the efforts for the next 100 years to advance a future where public health is at the epicenter of sustainable social progress.
